... This is a sample ore body in situ, and it shows massive diamond concentrations of up to 3.4 carats per ton. Diamonds have been extracted with no help from CFosSpeed. All the diamonds were picked up independently with a diamond detector. The entire 4th print zone at 44 degrees had the right size stones for diamond picking. Clayminer This is a typical undisturbed low grade clay mineral vein in situ. There are some small diamond outcrops in the middle of the stream, but the majority of the diamonds are smaller than 5 carats. This was probably a newer vein that was filled with shale as the clay became clogged and then worn by the passage of older shale. Subwaytiger This is a typical Subway Surfer vein, which is a conglomerate of bituminous shale and siliceous sand that has been cemented together. This vein was like a brick wall under the flat surface, and contained both good size diamonds and even more smaller stones. S.E.R. This is a sample of a mine that is currently being developed. It contains small, cheap diamonds. They aren't so small as to be pickable and also small enough to pass near the surface of the crushed rock. They are probably used as a "counter cut" to enhance the size of larger diamonds. Because you can change the configuration, we offer 20 different parameters to change the configuration.
