I'm recommending this game because it has an interesting concept, BUT (and there is a big but here) the game is NOT a complete game. The developers had a great concept and made a game to the point where it could be played and just stopped there. Had they fleshed out the game more it could have been a truly amazing blend of card game and RPG. For what it is currently it is WAY over priced and I would suggest picking it up only if you can get it for less than a couple of dollars.

The base concept is that you play cards where the higher card takes the lower card, but the suit of the cards matters. One suit is designated as the trump suit for a three-card round. Whoever leads (and you always initially get to go first) determines the suit in play, and if the opponant doesn't have a card of that suit he automatically loses whatever card he has played unless he can play a card of the trump suit. One problem I found was that the computer AI does not use a lot of strategy. If you play a high card from a suit that is not the trump suit, the computer will always play a card of that suit if it has one, even if it is lower, even if it has cards of the trump suit in its hand.

The RPG element is that you have a hero who is battling a foe and every time a card gets taken an attack is made by the victor. It can take several attacks to take down a foe, so you can go through a couple of three-card rounds for each foe. But that is as much as there is to the game. There are 3 characters to choose, whose stats are only slightly different. You level up and assign stats, but your level and assigned stats is the same for each character when you swap them (so you can not level them up seperately and focus one hero on hitting and one on blocking).

So the concept is there for a whole game with different hero campaigns and different strategies and the like, the developers just didn't bother to actually include any of that into the game. But if you like the concept of a traditional card game blended with RPG elements, and this game is discounted super cheap, then I suggest giving it a try because it is fun, what little there is to play of it.. So I really wanted to like this game because I am a big fan of card based RPG's but there is just too much missing from this game to be likeable.

So there is no real campaign persay, you pick 1 of 3 starting characters and basically just battle through 15 oponents to complete their story, there is a little bit of a story writeup in the description of the enemy.

There is almost no character customization other than the points you place in the health, attack, or defense of your cahracter tab.

There is no tutorial for the card game, basically after playing several times and dying you figure out its basically 3 card spades. The deck shows you whats trump and you try to play the highest card in each suit, or a trump card if your out, like Spades.

The opponents are mostly repititve and the same art with little to know idea of how hard they are going to hit you when they win a hand.

Basically fight through the list with 3 card spades, rinse and repeat.

They would have to add a lot more to the game to get me to purchase this again, esepcially at a $10 price tag or even the $7 price tag on sale for launch.
